MUSIC OF SILENCE

Over the past ten years, Susan Schwalb has employed a spare, minimal vocabulary of horizontal lines and bands, drawn across layered fields of color, to create several remarkably resonant and nuanced series of paintings and drawings. In contrast to the cool geometry of conventional Minimalism, the artist's work, based on process and the handmade, evoking nature and natural phenomena, repetition and time, perception and individual experience, suggests a feminist approach to modernism. Though essentially abstract in form Schwalb's work, small-scaled and intimate, refers to the real world.

The artist claims to “find the work” through the process and materials of its making. She begins by applying three or four layers of acrylic wash to a gessoed wood panel to produce a smooth surface which she breaks by sanding in lines, marks, or incisions, revealing various colors beneath. At various moments she introduces silverpoint, a medium the artist has used for over thirty years but has recently employed in new and unconventional ways. Instead of using a metal stylus to draw a fine, figurative line, in the tradition of such precursors as Albrecht Dürer and Leonardo da Vinci, Schwalb rubs thin pieces of metal across her paintings leaving softly-toned, horizontal bands of silver, or in some cases gold, copper, or bronze, on their surface. The finished work, at once layered and luminous, alludes to the earth's strata, as the title of an earlier series attests, while appearing to shimmer before our eyes.

Elusive things, such as remembered color and the quality of light, suffuse the artist's paintings and capture a sense of the places she has lived and worked. In Music of Silence I (2006), Schwalb conveys the cool, grey light of winter in the northeast through silvery tones marked by subtle traces of red. Pale expanses of green and blue repeatedly traversed by undulating horizontal lines may recall moonlight reflected on the ocean near the New England shore in the triptych Soundings (2007). The sun and heat of the southwest seems to animate the painting 7:55 PM (2007) in which a saturated ochre field is injected with deep reds and vibrating pinks at the horizon to describe a tremulous twilight. In these works, and others, the artist recalls aspects of the natural world in simple, poetic, often sensual terms.

The series' title, the Music of Silence, adapted from a poem by Stéphane Mallarmé, refers to another source of inspiration for the artist. The gentle rhythms of her modulated silverpoint bands, and evocation of sound waves in her wavering colored lines, suggest an affinity with music, as does the language she chooses to describe the “echoes” or “reverberations” of her work. It is interesting to note that her husband, Martin Boykan, is an accomplished composer and pianist, and author of a book of essays on music titled Silence and Slow Time.

Like the best abstract painting, Schwalb's work transcends technique and materials and aspires to the sublime. It is easy to lose oneself in her contemplative, quietly expressive work, and emerge richer for the experience.
